Sally Young  Queensland Psychoanalytic Psychotherapy Association
Shadows and Sunshine: Absence and Presence in Sibling Relationships

This paper suggests that the quality and dynamic of sibling relationships, either present or absent may have been overlooked in therapy and that in overlooking this we have also overlooked a significant feature in the emotional life of children and adults. Sibling relationships have a particular dynamic quality of being remembered and forgotten in inner life. The impact of trauma on sibling relationships and the young person and family is also focussed on.

Peter Blake  Institute of Child and Adolescent Psychoanalytic Psychotherapy
A Plea for Playing: Making the Conscious Unconscious

This paper questions the centrality of the transference and interpretation in child and adolescent psychotherapy. It argues that there has been a quiet revolution in analytic therapy over the last two decades. The influence of recent interpretations of Bion’s work by Ogden and Ferro and the influence of a more relational perspective, along with the work of Alan Schore and the growing evidence of the importance of the therapist tuning into their own unconscious is presented. It is proposed that these changes have fundamentally changed the aims and actual practice of psychotherapy. The importance of intuition and working in a more nonlinear way is discussed both in relation to current practices and trainings of psychotherapists. Winnicott’s ideas about the importance of playing is a backdrop to this paper.
